About

My research is on Ancient Near Eastern Studies with special reference to Iraq and Syria and a concentration on cultural history and literature. I also have interests in Pre-Islamic Arabia.

Biography

I studied Assyriology, Classical Arabic and Biblical Hebrew at Cambridge and then completed a doctorate in Assyriology at Birmingham under the supervision of W.G. Lambert. I was a research fellow for two years in Munich, where I also studied with D.O. Edzard and C. Wilcke. There followed a four year stint as Archaeological Adviser in the Department of Antiquities and Museums in Riyadh with intensive involvement in the Comprehensive Archaeological Survey of Arabia then being carried out. After teaching Assyriology for eight years at Heidelberg I joined the University of Birmingham in 1993.

Teaching

I regularly teach Akkadian (Babylonian and Assyrian) and Sumerian at the postgraduate level as part of the MPhil Programme in Cuneiform and Near Eastern Studies that I set up when I joined the University. Cuneiform has also proved popular as an undergraduate subject as well as courses on the cultural history, literature and mythology of the Ancient Near East. Over the years a wide range of Near Eastern topics has been covered in numerous third year dissertations under my supervision.

Postgraduate supervision

The MPhil Programme in Cuneiform and Near Eastern Studies \(/postgraduate/courses/combined/caha/cuneiform-ancient-near-eastern-studies.aspx\) directed by me includes an introduction to Akkadian and Sumerian, research training in the cuneiform script and a Masters' thesis on a topic of the student's choice. I have also supervised many PhD theses on a variety of topics ranging from Sumerian market gardening in the twenty-first century BC to the impact of the world-wide web on Ancient Near Eastern studies. However, the main focus of the postgraduate research that I supervise at both masters' and doctoral level is on the literary and cultural history of Assyria and Babylonia from the late second millennium BC down to the fall of Babylon in 539 BC.

Research

My research centres on the cultural history of the Ancient Near East. I also have close research links with the Department of the Near East in the British Museum and a major focus of my research involves the edition and publication of cuneiform tablets from the Museum's vast holdings. My most significant project at the moment involves a comprehensive study and edition of the Assyrian and Babylonian literary calendar texts in which many cuneiform tablets from both Assyria and Babylonia will be published for the first time.

At the centre of interest in these texts is not only religion but also the daily life of the Mesopotamians and the texts supply much new information about Babylonian social history. I have also worked extensively on Assyrian and Babylonian literature and am currently preparing a volume elucidating the historical and political context of Neo-Assyrian Literature.

I am particularly interested in ritual and a project that I am developing aims to place the study of Ancient Near Eastern ritual within a wider context of ancient and modern interpretation. I have also researched and published on Pre-Islamic Arabia, especially the North-western Hejaz and hope to make a detailed study of the Arabs as attested in cuneiform documents. From 2003 to 2007 I directed a project on cuneiform palaeography funded by The Leverhulme Trust that has resulted in an open access resource, www.cuneiform.net (<http://www.cuneiform.net>).

Other activities

I am a permanent member of the Steering Committee of the British Association for Near Eastern Archaeology. Extramurally, I am interested in folklore and musicology, especially that of South-east Africa and the Western Highlands of Scotland.
