About

Since 2000, I have been Academic Director at Ironbridge International Institute for Cultural Heritage, a leading provider of International and World Heritage Management training for postgraduate students. I am editor of the Historic Environment Journal and represent the University on a number of committees within the Institute for Archaeologists.

Qualifications

- BA (Hons) Ancient and Medieval History and Archaeology (University of Liverpool)
- PhD 'Roman and Celtic Objects in Anglo-Saxon Graves' (University of Liverpool, 1987)

Biography

By training, I am an archaeologist and for much of my working life my research interest has focused on Wroxeter Roman City, in Shropshire. My long-term involvement with this site has led to my frequent use as a consultant by English Heritage regarding aspects of the management and interpretation of the site. Geographically, my research interests extend over the West Midlands, Wales and the north west, while my chronological interests cover the millennia before and after Christ's birth, that is from the later Bronze Age to the Vikings. Within this broad span, my main research interests lie in the period of transition from the late Roman to early medieval period and especially so in the west of Britain, the late Roman province of Britannia Prima.

My role at Ironbridge encompasses teaching and research, where I have responsibility for developing and delivering the distance learning programmes in heritage management (<http://www.ironbridge.bham.ac.uk/programmes/heritagedistance/index.shtml>) offered there. I also research into the industrial archaeology of Shropshire, with particular interest in the broadest sense of understanding the impact that industrialisation has had on societies and in the management of industrial landscapes. This theme can be seen most clearly in my work on the Cleve Hills in Shropshire and in Ironbridge.

This latter theme overlaps with his interests in Heritage management, and this role is increasingly being reflected in his work both at Ironbridge and in Archaeology, with whom he maintains close ties in heritage management offered there. I also research into the industrial archaeology of Shropshire, with particular interest in the broadest sense of understanding the impact that industrialisation has had on societies and in the management of industrial landscapes. This theme can be seen most clearly in my work on the Cleve Hills in Shropshire and in Ironbridge.

Research

My primary focus for research is on the Roman period, and especially Late Antiquity. My interest in this field has arisen from my work at Wroxeter but also through my PhD and generally through a fascination with the changing society and material culture of this formative period of British History. For the same reasons, I am drawn towards the archaeological study of the industrial age where the wealth of material and sources offers a stark contrast to my earlier research period in the 'dark ages'.

Other activities

I am a member of the English Heritage Advisory Committee since May 2011 and am currently a Council Member of the Institute for Archaeologists. From 2007 until 2010 was Chair of its Professional Training Committee and joined as a Member of the IfA in 1987.

From 2008-2011 I was on the Committee for the Society for the Promotion of Roman Studies and was involved in the conferences held in 2010 to commemorate the 'End of Roman Britain' in AD 410, giving papers in Cardiff and Aberystwyth.

In 2010 I also gave papers at the Roman Archaeology Conference in Oxford and at the European Association of Archaeologists in The Hague. I have been a Committee member for the Shropshire Archaeological and Historical Society since 1994.
