HSMC academics, Helen Dickinson and Kerry Allen, were recently invited to present findings from their PhD research at a seminar led by Roy Bhaskar, the eminent British philosopher. Kerry and Helen presented insights from their research in a session called 'Applications of critical realism in health services research: Possibilities and practice' to an audience at London's Institute of Education.

The Critical Realism movement considers the reconciliation between the world as it is (real and objective) and the world as it is perceived and made sense of by individuals
