Biography

Professor Gillborn's first full-time job in higher education was as a Lecturer in Education at the University of Sheffield. After a spell as a research fellow, working closely with Jean Rudduck and John Gray, he moved to the Institute of Education, University of London, in the Department of Policy Studies led by Geoff Whitty. Geoff went on to become Director of the Institute while David became a Reader in Sociology of Education (1996) and then a Professor (in 2000). After almost 20 years at the Institute, David moved to Birmingham in 2012. Despite having worked in the North and South, David remains a committed Midlander with a season ticket to the City Ground and an unshakeable belief that Nottingham Forest FC will once again reign supreme.

Teaching

David Gillborn's teaching is closely allied to his research interests in Critical Race Theory and countering inequities in education. In particular, he focuses on education policy and the construction of race inequality; the complex and changing nature of racism(s) in educational practice; research methods and controversies in race scholarship. David currently teaches on the courses 'Education Policy & Social Justice', 'Identity, Politics and Everyday Life', and 'Researching Education'.

Postgraduate supervision

David supervises doctoral students working on a wide range of issues, usually with a focus on the construction of educational inequalities through policy and practice. Past projects include the transmission of educational values in the parenting of Black British families; a study of medical education; the schooling experiences of academically successful African Caribbean students; assessment practices in Early Years education; and ethnographic studies of class, race, gender and disability in the everyday life of schools.

Research

Race, Racism and Education: inequality, resilience and reform in policy and practice

David is principal investigator for this 2 year project, funded by the Society for Educational Studies \(http://www.soc-for-ed-studies.org.uk/\). The project combines two key elements; first, a quantitative analysis of statistical data to provide the first-ever authoritative picture of the changing landscape of educational achievement and experience in relation to ethnic diversity over the 20 year span since the murder of Stephen Lawrence. Second, drawing on links with policy-makers, advisors and race equality advocacy groups, the research team will use ethnographic interviews to explore the processes by which policy was formed, contested, and re-modelled during this unique period.

The Educational Strategies of the Black Middle Class

Funded by the Economic & Social Research Council this project explores how Black Middle Class parents view the education of their children. The research extends understandings of class/race intersectionality in the lives of parents, children and schools. Carol Vincent is Principal Investigator.

A new book (The Colour of Class, written with Nicola Rollock, Carol Vincent and Stephen J. Ball) arising from this project will be published in the Autumn, 2014. For further details see <http://www.routledge.com/books/details/9780415809825/>

REACH: raising the aspirations and attainments of Black boys and young men

Co-ordinated by the Department for Communities & Local Government, the REACH initiative brought together a range of activists, experts and community-members to explore ways of reducing race inequality in education. The group produced an independent report and went on to examine ways in which school inspections could be improved to better support race equality.

Aiming High: African Caribbean Achievement Project

David was part of the team (led by Professor Leon Tikly at Bristol University) that evaluated the pilot programme of 'Aiming High', an initiative dedicated to raising Black students' achievement through dedicated work with a sample of schools. Their report highlighted both successes and problems.
