About

I am a medieval historian who works on China. I am particularly interested in borders, frontiers and borderlands and the people who live in and around such places.

Qualifications

- BA History (London Queen Mary)
- PhD East Asian Studies (Durham)

Biography

My BA is in early medieval European history, but I got interested in China along the way, and studied modern and classical Chinese in Taiwan in order to do my PhD.

I held a Junior Research Fellowship at St John's College, Oxford, then worked for two years at the University of Wisconsin-Superior, a small, public, liberal arts college, which gave me a crash course in teaching.

In 2000 I participated in a 6-month research group at the Institute for Advanced Study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, before returning to the UK to take up a lectureship in Chinese history at Newcastle. There I helped to develop East Asian history within the History programme, and East Asian Studies across the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, and became senior lecturer in 2007.

Teaching

- AHRC project (2010-11): Continental Asia and subtropical China, 600-1400 (<http://www.ncl.ac.uk/historical/research/project/3612>)

My research starts from a fascination with frontiers, borders, boundaries and the ground-level functioning of borderlands, with a focus on eastern Eurasia in China's Middle Period (c. 600-1400).

My goal is to learn more about the everyday interactions, negotiations, conflicts and compromises of borderland regions: to understand the choices that borderlanders made, and the frameworks, motivations and imperatives that shaped those decisions. My work seeks more complex understandings of 'China', its peoples and its neighbours, which opens up these groupings and their relationships to rigorous comparative analysis.

My current project is a radical rethink of eastern Eurasian geography in the Middle Period that aims to offer new ways of viewing China's place within Eurasia.
