Qualifications

- LLM (Nottingham)
- Phd (Nottingham)

Biography

Dr Anastasia Vakulenko joined Birmingham Law School in September 2009. She had previously been a full-time lecturer at the University of Dundee and had taught part time at Nottingham and Keele Universities. She completed her undergraduate studies at Donetsk National University in Ukraine and the Cambridge-run British Centre for English and European Legal Studies at Warsaw University. Having obtained her masters degree in International Human Rights Law with Distinction at the University of Nottingham, she was involved in practically-oriented human rights work, including representing cases before the European Court of Human Rights. She then completed her PhD thesis at Nottingham.

Teaching

- LLM International Law of Human Rights
- LLB International Human Rights
- LLB Law of Obligations A
- LLB Law of Obligations B
- GDL Tort Law

Postgraduate supervision

- Domestic and international human rights
- Religion and secularism
- Critical and feminist theory

Current doctoral supervision

Dr Vakulenko is currently supervising one doctoral student undertaking research in the following area:

- Lost in translation? An examination of international European and United Kingdom law concerning the right to asylum through the upholding of asylum seekers' access to the full asylum determination process

Research

Anastasia Vakulenko is interested in human rights and critical theory. One particular direction of her research has been Islamic dress, gender and human rights. While at Dundee, she provided advice to the Scottish Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service on their guidance on the treatment of a witness, accused or defendant who wears a full facial covering in the course of criminal proceedings. Her monograph, entitled Islamic Veiling in Legal Discourse (<http://www.routledge.com/books/details/9780415565509/>), examines the Islamic veiling issue for what it reveals about western perceptions of human rights, gender, agency and religion. Anastasia's current research explores how freedom of religion in domestic and international human rights law is configured by a particular post-Christian understanding of secularism and religion, which does not always adequately represent the reality of religious experience.
