Annual Review

Executive Summary

TSRC’s first Annual Review covers the work of the Third Sector Research Centre since its inception in September 2008, and over the last financial year from 1 April 2009 to 31 March 2010.

Much of the first six months has been focused upon establishing the Centre’s structure, recruiting staff and networking with stakeholders. One of the major aims of this phase of establishment was the creation and implementation of extensive governance relations to ensure that TSRC is able to engage appropriately with the wide range of research users who have an interest in our work. The formal elements of this are listed on pages 8 and 9 of this Review. They include our Advisory Board, and the Reference Groups which are linked to various aspects of our rather complex and extensive research programmes. They also include our plans to engage with, and research on, the devolved administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Although part of our funding comes from the Office of the Third Sector, which is an English Department, we have been established as a UK research centre and we are keen to ensure that we develop a critical understanding of the development and impact of devolved third sector policy and practice in the different nations. We are also working closely with academic and other colleagues in the three countries to promote and support the development of related research activity in, and on, those countries.

The Centre currently has 21 full time equivalent research staff who are working on a range of innovative projects. For example we are laying the groundwork for two exciting longitudinal projects which will track developments in the sector using qualitative and quantitative methods. The ‘Real Times’ project will follow a sample of third sector organisations over time using interviews and focus groups, while quantitative researchers will assemble a substantial panel of data from the Charity Commission’s register since the early 1990s. This will be an unparalleled resource for analysing change over time.

We have also conducted scoping exercises designed to provide a review of the state of current research in specific areas (such as housing and social enterprise). As part of such ground-clearing exercises we have collated a large volume of research publications on the third sector; we are intending to preserve this and make it more widely available for public use through a partnership with the British Library, subject to the availability of funding.

These activities are necessary to establish firm foundations for a long-term research programme, but researchers are already in the field, generating new findings. To give just two examples we have been conducting (and will continue to conduct) interviews on the changing policy environment with policymakers and senior stakeholders in the sector, while we are also engaged in ‘micro-mapping’ of small scale community organisations which are often neglected in studies of this sector.

The development and publication of Working Papers from our research is one of our core commitments. These are regularly uploaded onto our website along with shorter and more accessible Briefing Papers outlining key messages for a wider audience. We have already produced over 30 papers and many of these will also be developed into independent academic publications, as some already have.

The other major commitment in our first year has been the establishment of our Knowledge Exchange Team. This is a tangible expression of our commitment to engagement with a wide range of research users (including policymakers and practitioners). The team have already been active this year in setting up our website, developing our communications and impact strategy, and networking with stakeholders across the country.

We are also working with three Capacity Building Clusters to promote and support the building of capacity for the sector (see page 4 for their most recent achievements).

The long term aim of TSRC is to establish a permanent centre for academic research on the third sector in the UK. We are concerned to ensure that our research has a real impact on policy and practice. We believe that our first year of activity has seen us establish firm foundations for a long-term programme of high quality, influential and relevant research.

Pete Alcock, Director
John Mohan, Deputy Director

Funders’ Comments

The Steering Committee, representing the funders, congratulate the team on the work undertaken in the first year; and are pleased with the significant progress that has been made in developing the research programmes, establishing the Knowledge Exchange Team and commencing the publication of a wide range of outputs.

They firmly support the Centre’s work to establish an extensive and reliable evidence base for the sector.

They recognise the investment that has been made in this and are looking forward to the more detailed analysis that will flow from this in the coming months and years. They are also pleased with the Centre’s commitments to collaborate with other researchers in the field and to engage with research users and stakeholders across the sector.
The Theory and Policy work stream has developed a number of research projects over the first year of the Centre.

Four papers have already been published looking at devolution and divergence (2), theory and policy ideologies (13), strategic and divergence (2), theory and published looking at devolution (19). Four papers have already been year of the Centre.

The impact of the devolution of third sector policy development to the separate administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is a major feature of the theory stream. The Centre for Research on the third sector is engaged in a project for Skills Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is a major feature of the new UK policy environment. Reference Groups have been recruited to support and advise on the value of volunteering in Europe in the noughties: what would Beveridge have thought? By Jeremy Kendall for an international conference.

The overall purpose of the study is to increase understanding of how third sector activity operates in practice, and whether and how it changes, over time, focusing on fortunes, strategies, challenges and performance. The research involves a range of data collection methods over successive waves of fieldwork over three to four years, with a diverse group of third sector organisations. Most have agreed to participate and the first wave of fieldwork is in progress.

Evidence Review and Longitudinal Research ‘Real Times’

Publication of summary papers from the initial evidence reviews will continue across research streams, including papers on the methodology behind literature reviews and the availability of quantitative datasets.

TSRC is exploring, with the British Library, mechanisms for making research material (references, original sources, summaries and reviews) available to the wider research, policy and practice community. This will include a searchable library accessible through TSRC’s website.

TSRC has developed an in-depth qualitative longitudinal study of third sector organisations ‘Real Times’. The overall purpose of the study is to increase understanding of how third sector activity operates in practice, and whether and how it changes, over time, focusing on fortunes, strategies, challenges and performance.

Mapping and Measurement

TSRC Deputy Director, John Mohan, University of Southampton has been leading the work to construct a very substantial database on the activities of registered charities which now covers the period 1995-2008.

There are approximately 1.7 million observations in this database (where one observation equals an identifiable charity reporting a valid income and expenditure figure for one year). This will permit a very sophisticated analysis of growth trends and of income concentration in the sector. The only other substantial panel of this kind would be that established by CAF or Caritas but these contain only between 300 and 1,000 observations, typically for the larger charities. By contrast, in our panel, over 40,000 organisations appear continuously from one year to the next throughout this period and this is much more representative of the sector as a whole.

A quarterly time-series of data from 1993-2009 on the size of the third sector workforce, from the Labour Force Survey has been developed and is already being used to investigate the changing composition of the workforce. A similar series from 17 years of the British Household Panel Survey has also been constructed. In partnership with NCVO TSRC is involved in a project for Skills Third Sector, an initial paper has explored trends in the workforce (28). This research stream has contributed towards the 2009 NCVO Almanac, and we have plans to continue our involvement with the Almanac in the future.

TSRC will provide quarterly updates on the ‘state of the sector’ in terms of total employment, drawing on the Labour Force Survey. Work has been done to establish the quality and availability of data for Scotland and Northern Ireland but at the present time we have not been in a position to analyse it.

Research on qualitative analysis of a sample of third sector organisations in Scotland is already under way, funded by the Scottish Government. Further opportunities for funding from within the devolved administrations will continue to be explored.

TSRC will be one of the research sites used by UK Data Archive (in their JISC project) for data development and management.
Impact: Service Delivery

Evidence review and scoping papers have been signed off by the Service Delivery (SD) Reference Group and, the priority themes for research over the coming year have been identified as:

- social and economic impact assessment;
- completion and publication of papers on cost benefit analysis and social return on investment;
- and other models of organisational impact assessment;
- third sector partnerships for service delivery: innovation and learning in third sector service providers;
- more detailed analysis of the role of third sector organisations within specific service sectors.

Six housing papers (10, 11, 16, 17, 18, 19) have been published exploring all aspects of housing provision. A paper reviewing the personalisation agenda has been published (30); and an initial paper exploring criminal justice and the third sector has also been published (34).

The sectors on which we will focus specifically in the coming year will be:

- health and social care housing
- employment services
- environment
- criminal justice.

This research will help to inform planning for service delivery at individual and organisational level, and will also contribute to the development of strategic policy intervention to support third sector organisations engaging, or seeking to engage, in the provision of public services.

Impact: Below the Radar

This research stream has produced four papers: exploring Below The Radar (BTR): issues of themes and focus (8); micro mapping methodologies (9); a literature review (29); and, the distinctiveness of BTR (33).

A number of events have been organised including Rethinking Cohesion; Participatory Action Research; Alternative Forms of Non Governmental Organisations (international perspectives); and Empowering Migrant and Refugee Community Organisations.

Initial BTR baseline interviews with 29 individuals/agencies have been completed and analysed with papers in progress.

As part of the ‘Real Times’ qualitative longitudinal study, the BTR case studies have been negotiated and are in progress. Blog and discussion sections on TSRC’s website have commenced and are in further development. Volunteers and community researchers have been recruited to help with the BTR micro-mapping.

A Black and Minority Ethnic (BME) cross-cutting work-stream has emerged from the BTR work.

Impact: Economic and Social

One of TSRC’s research streams is focused on the measurement of the social and economic impact of third sector organisations. This extends across the range of third sector organisational activity, but includes in particular the contribution that organisations within the sector make to the delivery of public services. This is a long term programme of activity, but over time it will provide a significant contribution to the practices of the third sector in evaluating the impact of their activities, and also provide aggregate measures of the broader contribution of the sector to social and economic outcomes.

Some initial think pieces have been produced by looking at the economic impact of the third sector (14), boundaries between sectors (25), the different values of the sector (26) and how the sector evaluates their impact (27).

Qualitative work at Southampton on ‘Organising the Third Sector’, which looks at working lives and organisational challenges will be commenced; and we will take forward work on the role of volunteering within welfare to work policies.

We will provide critical analysis of current approaches to evaluation and impact assessment, including Social Return on Investment (SROI), and advice on the advantages or disadvantages of different models. We will also explore the use of aggregate measures of third sector social and economic impact employing analysis which can utilise aggregate information contained in existing datasets.

We will be recruiting a Reference Group to advise and assist in the development of this research stream and the dissemination of its findings.

Social Enterprise

The social enterprise (SE) research stream is led by Fergus Lyon, University of Middlesex. This is a cross cutting research theme and has produced nine papers exploring: SE and social exclusion (3), homelessness (5), mapping (4), measuring the value of SE (7), how SE relates to the third sector (15), the environment (22), impression management (23), the failure of SE (31), and their regional geography (35). A number of papers have been successfully submitted to journals.

The Reference Group have met three times. Future plans include learning and innovating in SE, partnerships in delivery of public services, SE in the local context, public policy and the role of SE, gender and SE and quantitative measuring and mapping of SE.

Note: Bristol commenced January 2010
The first phase of the Knowledge Exchange Team’s (KET) strategy was to establish a web-based interactive presence and to raise the profile of TSRC within stakeholder communities. The team have done this over the past six months by:

- establishing a website with video’s, RSS feeds, blogs, discussion boards and research undertaken by TSRC to download;
- attending events, having over a dozen stands at national membership organization’s annual meetings (approximate attendance 300 – 600 at each event);
- presenting at regional, national and international conferences.

The next phase of KET’s work will be to co-host events in 2010 with partner organisations. Based on the work undertaken by researchers KET has produced a Briefing Paper series available to download from our website; a CD of our research; general leaflets and postcards to target different audiences. To date 35 papers have been published and nearly 500 hard copies of each of our first round of publications disseminated at events across the UK.

KET have also established an e-newsletter which goes out every two months to a distribution list of over 800 contacts. We have over 30 reciprocal web links.

TSRC has publicised its activities in the newsletters of several partner organisations including NCVO, ESRC ARVAC, and the Evidence Network.

Key Achievements

TSRC has finalised its governance structure: recruited to its Steering Committee, Advisory Board, Research Reference Groups (six including for the devolved administrations – with more to follow), Project Management Team and held, at least first meetings where terms of reference have been agreed.

The Centre has so far published 16 Working Papers and 35 Briefing Papers covering evidence review, definitions, research methodology, case studies and early findings.

TSRC researchers have presented their research at 75 events to a total audience of 5000 third sector stakeholders.

Forward Priorities

We will continue developing our research streams and start producing quantitative analysis from our cleaned datasets, as well as reflecting new emerging policy priorities to help inform evidence based policy making and practice.

A new cross-cutting research theme on BME has emerged from the Below The Radar research stream. Working with the Workforce and Workplace research stream the BME research stream will review large-scale secondary statistical datasets on paid work in the third sector, and volunteering, to examine their usefulness for analysing aspects of BME groups in this area of study.

To help provide labour market intelligence and to identify skills and capacity gaps in the sector, TSRC (with NCVO) has set up a partnership with the Skills Third Sector. Over the next 18 months TSRC will be analysing data on the workforce in order to identify training needs within the third sector, and how any deficiencies might be addressed through the strategy of Skills Third Sector.

Funded Aims of TSRC

Established a sustainable resource of robust databases on the sector, and key subsectors, in the UK
Continued efforts will be made to evaluate the quality of existing datasets and from there to make recommendations about gathering of statistics in the future, including ongoing liaison with ONS and other data providers.

Established longitudinal analysis of the sector and organisational dynamics and secured the base for ongoing analysis into the future
First phases of fieldwork will be completed for all Level A and Level B case studies, and Nvivo database established for analysis.

Developed robust analysis of the impact and value of the sector, and models which can be used by policy makers and practitioners
Further analysis and publications on models of impact assessment. Development of aggregate measures and identification of appropriate data sources for analysis.

Enhanced the capacity for research on the sector and worked closely with sector agencies to ensure a sustainable programme of knowledge transfer
Further development of website and dissemination of research findings to a wide range of audiences. TSRC’s Knowledge Exchange Team will collaborate with the Public Management and Policy Association to host an event ‘Good decision in hard times: assessing the value of third sector organisations’. This event will be aimed at a wide public sector audience, interested in issues such as the value of social enterprise and the voluntary sector.

Extended theoretical and conceptual analysis of the sector to broaden and deepen the understanding of its scope and its diversity and the differential impact of policy interventions across these dimensions
Further analysis and publications planned on UK policy environment, impact of economic recession and general election. Further analysis and publications will be developed on organisations operating ‘below the radar’ and a black and minority ethnic subsector.

TSRC has undertaken 38 partner collaborations and been successful in applying for 19 extra research/evaluation projects.

Research on measuring impact of social enterprises have been used to inform policy at regional level (East of England), and by the Big Lottery Fund.

Birmingham, Middlesex and Southampton have set up seminar series to offer the wider public an opportunity to find out more about the research underway.

Other collaborative projects are also being agreed with third sector partners. A number of major events are planned to debate the research of TSRC to policy makers, thinkers and leaders, to the wider third sector and in partnership with other leading third sector organisations. This will include a mid-term event in 2011, as well as policy symposiums and impact events on research areas.

There are plans to publish books and more journal articles as well as pieces for the media.
