OVERVIEW

The public sector is a changing, challenging, and rewarding environment to work in and for over 50 years the Institute of Local Government Studies (INLOGOV) at the University of Birmingham has been at the forefront of the provision of training and critical thinking on issues facing the sector.

This programme builds on our decades of experience to provide a state-of-the-art Public Management and Leadership Degree Apprenticeship. The programme has been designed in close collaboration with employers, and in partnership with the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE), to ensure that learners are equipped with the knowledge, skills and competencies required to be an effective and dynamic public sector leader.

The programme is innovative in its design and is at the forefront of best practice, blending interactive online study with campus based 'face-to-face' enquiry-led activities, drawing together the strengths of these different platforms to ensure a high quality learning experience. At various points throughout the programme senior leaders from across the public sector will join us to share their experiences and offer case study examples allowing learners to benefit from the invaluable experience gained by others.

Typically, taught modules are assessed through a variety of essay-based and task-orientated assignments. Each module will include one or more assignments, equivalent to a total of 4,000 words per module. Learners will have a personal tutor who will provide support and guidance throughout the programme, as well as a practice-tutor who will provide support in their workplace.
